

Javier Solana

– ‘A Person of Interest’

BY CONSTANCE CUMBEY

Javier Solana and I are coming up on our “tenth anniversary” so to speak. That day of mixed curses and blessings occurred on November 22, 1995. After devoting time to researching and exposing the New Age Movement and revealing its prophetic ramifications to the Christian community, I returned to the full-time practice of law on December 1, 1988. I continued speaking on the New Age Movement, edited a newsletter and, with the assistance of an interested fellow church member, ran a computer bulletin board service on the New Age Movement and the New World Order.

On the evening of November 21st, after carrying out my work as an attorney, I retired for the night near 11:30 p.m. I was to be at the Wayne County Circuit Court on November 22, 1995, at 8:15 a.m. before an “on-time” judge who liked early morning.

Sleep was precious, but weather conditions were problematic.

I awoke at 3 a.m., which was unacceptable. I needed every second of sleep to be an effective advocate. I tried my usual remedy of going to my husband’s easy chair to read a book sufficiently boring to force my eyes shut. After an hour had passed, I headed for my basement office and logged on to my email account. The opening screen contained information about a strong earthquake that had just struck Israel. Epicentered in Eilat, the 7.2 mw quake had caused massive devastation to the area. I clicked the appropriate link for more details. The Reuters story appeared with related sidebars. One link read:

“EU-Israel enter into treaty”

Of course, as a long-time prophecy student, that interested me. I clicked on the link and learned that the treaty had been negotiated by one Javier Solana acting under “a full power of attorney” from two European organizations: The European Union and the ten-nation Western European Union, a military federation. My first thought was: “Who is this guy?”

In researching the New Age Movement, I read of their aspirations to scan major world books and news onto CD-ROMS. That way they could save trees and make books instantly accessible – all at the same time. I remember reading this to my husband back in 1982 and saying, “That’s one of their better ideas. I’ll get the first collection and keep up with them and clean house at the same time.”

I had a serious collection of CD-ROMS. I had Buckmaster disks, a news service specializing in archiving business news. I took a disk from earlier in the year and typed the name, “Javier Solana.” Instantly, back came several articles. The one that caught my eye was about a near war at high sea between Spain and Canada in March, 1995. Three Spanish warships had been dispatched close to Canadian waters by Javier Solana, acting in his authority as Foreign Minister for Spain. According to Canada, Spain had fished the halibut, turbot, and cod stocks almost to the point of extinction. Canada made fruitless pleas for moderation. When one Spanish trawler, the Estai, strayed into official Canadian waters, Canada boarded it and took it into custody. With great public fanfare, Solana promptly responded by dispatching three war ships.

The press release was one of the most incredible incidents of political doublespeak I have ever read. To summarize:

- Yes, there are global treaties about fishing;
- The treaties cover only the types – not the amount of fish caught;
- If we are going to have limits on fishing, they should apply equally to all countries and not just to Spain;
- Spanish fishermen originally discovered the Newfoundland fishing banks; therefore, they should have every right to exploit them.

While I was looking at this in amazed wonder, a new Reuters article popped up about the earthquake. It had come in the wake of an expected political earthquake in the form of the pending Barcelona Conference, which would conclude the Barcelona Treaty. Javier Solana, with his dual power of attorney from the European Union and ten-nation Western European Union, would be solely in charge. There were three major items on the agenda, which were summarized by Reuters as follows:

- Battling religious fundamentalism –worldwide;
- Favorable trading terms for the partners in the Mediterranean basin;
- Get the U.S. out of the Mediterranean and/or greatly reduce its presence there.

Twenty-seven nations were to be in attendance. The participants were clearly from an area paralleling the old Roman Empire. The only Mediterranean nation that would not be part of the proceedings was Libya. It seems that, only a few days earlier, Muammar Khaddafi had screamed at a gathering of Arab League nations, “What’s the matter with you idiots? Can’t you see this is a blatant European attempt to gain hegemony over our area?”

That’s exactly what it was. As I see it, if God could speak to Baalam through his donkey, he could speak through Khaddafi as well. His warning was ignored. Khaddafi himself later became panicked at being left out of “the European Club” and was admitted to conditional membership in the 2000 Barcelona Process.

The U.S., according to the Reuters account, had requested to participate in the Barcelona Conference. They were denied on November 22, 1995, and “granted observer status only.”

Thanks to a certain proficiency in internet usage, I too had ‘observer status.’ I did it ‘the poor man’s way.’ Each night, I sat for hours at my computer calmly pulling down all available online working documents, press releases and articles related to the conference.

Solana opened the conference on November 27th with what appeared to be an attack on Catholics. He said it was auspicious that the conference began on the 900th anniversary of the calling of the first crusade by Pope Urban II. “What a lot of intolerance and misunderstanding that led to,” said Solana. The two-day conference concluded with a group picture and Solana successfully achieving his desired treaty. He was given sole credit for the ‘diplomatic accomplishment.’ Ehud Barak was there representing Israel. He said that, at long last, Israel had joined the ‘European Club’ and that such membership was long overdue. They had ‘beaten their swords into plowshares,” gushed Barak. Yasser Arafat was equally adulatory.

On November 28th, I sent emails to my entire distribution list saying, “Watch out for this guy.” One of the recipients of my email, called me on November 30th and said, “Turn on your television – quick!” I turned on the set. There on CNN was Javier Solana, giving me the opportunity to see his face for the first time. He had just been unanimously voted the new head of NATO to the utter astonishment of the Spanish press. They noted that if anybody had predicted such a development even five years earlier, they would have been locked up as a total lunatic. Javier Solana was the leading Spanish opponent of NATO. He had written a pamphlet titled “50 Reasons to Say NO to NATO.” In 1996, Boris Yeltsin ran for re-election as Russian president. His campaign theme: “You’d better vote for me – I’m the only person who can stand up to Javier Solana.”

I was dumbfounded. I sent an email to the White House and said, “Please don’t back Javier Solana as the new head of NATO.” I cited his “let’s get the U.S. out of the Mediterranean” stance from only a few days before. A few days later I came home and my husband said, “You have a letter from the White House.” It was from President Clinton who thanked me for the opinions I had expressed on Señor Solana’s ascendancy to the NATO position.

On March 21, 1996, I awoke with a migraine headache. Normally, I would have been getting ready for church. It was clear that I was going nowhere. I took three pain pills and headed back to bed. Barry turned on “Sunday Morning”, a CBS news program. As I was lying there nursing my headache, the host stopped to read a statement. “We interrupt this program to bring you an important special announcement – Javier Solana, the Secretary General of NATO, has just announced that the bombing of Yugoslavia might start as soon as the next few hours.” Scenes were then shown of angry Yugoslavian crowds protesting the planned NATO actions.

As soon my condition improved, I headed for my computer and did a search to see what Javier Solana had been up to lately. I found a speech where he was accepting a foreign policy award from a U.S. organization. He cited George Washington’s warning speech to the U.S. against “entangling foreign alliances.” “Why those entangling foreign alliances are good for you!” said Solana. I could not help but think of Daniel’s prophecy of “a mouth speaking great things.”

In the same speech, Solana said that he had been given exclusive military powers over Yugoslavia, including whether or not to bomb it. Solana said he did not intend to use the authority without first checking in with the others, “but nevertheless, the power is mine and mine alone.” Further internet searches led me to Madeleine Albright’s State Department website. On it, she stated that “Solana has the power and has had it since January 30th. We are speaking with one voice through Javier Solana.”

That night, I watched as President Clinton came on national television to announce the forthcoming bombings to the American public. He never said, “This is what I think we should do,” or “this is what we think we should do,” or even “this is what the heads of the world community think would be wise.” Instead Clinton said: “I agree with Javier Solana’s decision to do this.”

Amazingly, nobody ever asked, “Who’s Javier Solana?” I heard on our local news station that Pope John

*“Your guess
as to the Antichrist’s identity is as good as mine.
For now, however, it appears increasingly clear that Javier Solana may well be the best ‘educated guess.’”*

Paul II and a Russian Orthodox patriarch by the name of Alexiye had sent emissaries into Brussels to ask Solana to please cease the bombing ‘between the two Easters’ and give them a chance to try and mediate a peace for the region. A headline in our local paper on Good Friday, April 2, 1999 read “Pope Rebuffed.” A few days later I saw a photograph of the two church heads sitting together looking like two very dejected, and defeated old men. A week after Easter, I ran into Spencer Abraham, our junior U.S. senator from Michigan, and asked him, “Why did we hand all that power to Solana?” His answer astonished me.

He said he didn’t understand the Yugoslavian policy himself – it made no sense to him. He thought it might be President Clinton hiding behind Solana. Then he volunteered to me that he had met Javier Solana personally.

Solana left his NATO position a few months before his job officially expired. He went to take a new position with the European Union – as “high representative” for the “Common Foreign and Security Policy.” He was reported to be the ‘new tsar’ of all EU military and foreign affairs. He would also be the “Secretary General of the European Union.” The latter was to give continuity “between administrations.”

Solana’s new job had been created in December 1998, while he was still with NATO. The specifications were obviously written around him and his NATO experience. The job was codified in the official Europa documents as “Section 666”. Approximately six weeks later, on November 20, 1999, it was announced that he was being handed all the power of the Western European Union, a military federation with ten permanent members. He continued to make his routine announcements that he was “working on a permanent solution for peace in the Middle East.”

On June 5, 2000, he introduced a bill in the Western European Union Assembly. It proposed giving him expanded police and military powers over Europe. It would enable him to preside over the Political Security Committee (PSC and/or COPS) and enable him to convene the Council of the European Union in the event of an emergency. That bill, Recommendation 666, was passed and codified at Nice, France in December 2000.

Is Javier Solana the one? Should we look for another? I don’t know; but if he’s not, maybe the European prosecutor should consider drawing up an indictment – for identity theft. Your guess as to the Antichrist’s identity is as good as mine. For now, however, it appears increasingly clear that Javier Solana may well be the best “educated guess.”

May we realize the seriousness of our times and may the Lord help us all!
